The present invention relates generally to communication networks, and more particularly, to adaptive beaconing in the capability discovery sub-protocol (CAPD) of communication networks. The capability discovery sub-protocol (CAPD) is used to exchange information about capability regarding a communication device in a communication network. For example, the CAPD is used to exchange information for sending and receiving a packet data user plane for a user equipment (UE). The UE should be able to perform a packet access network discovery by receiving the CAPD information. For example, the CAPD information may contain the capabilities of the network. The elements in a communication network include a host, a base station, a sub-system, a device and a radio access network. The CAPD information should be able to distinguish, from among the elements that may support or may be capable of supporting the capability identified by the CAPD, the host, base station or sub-system. There may be multiple capabilities in the communication network which indicate that multiple elements share the same capability, which may be referred to as "common" capabilities. For example, a physical layer wide area network (WAN) capability may be the same as a second physical layer protocol wide area network (LAN) capability, and in that case the host, the base station, or the sub-system should be able to distinguish the two capabilities. For example, the IEEE 802.11 wireless LAN standard defines a physical layer bridge (PHY BRIDGE) capability, which may be used by base stations and host devices. The controller of the adrenalectomized mice, ethylmorphine relieves one form of the opiate withdrawal syndrome elicited by morphine or by the long-lasting (3--4 hr.) high-dose morphine tolerance. It does not relieve another form of this syndrome, nor does it relieve tolerance induced by nalorphine or naloxone. The specificity of ethylmorphine's action is demonstrated by its being effective not only in models of morphine withdrawal (as previously demonstrated), but also in models of opiate withdrawal from other long-lasting opiate preparations (as here documented).
