Senators leaving the Capitol in DC with the families and friends of coronavirus victims. (Gage Skidmore / CC 2.0) Last week, I released my new blog, Justice Is Not for Sale. The blog's title refers to a series of tweets I posted in late February when I began questioning the political nature of the courts and the legal profession, and whether the courts should be subjected to what is essentially a business lobby. Of course, this post is not intended to be a critique of the legal profession, or to suggest that the courts should be self-governing. When it comes to the Constitution and the Founders' blueprint for governing, I believe the courts are the exception, not the rule. The courts should always defer to Congress and the president. What I did question was the extent to which a legal service organization representing the legal profession — such as the Supreme Court and lower courts — had become a part of the business lobby. My research into the Supreme Court's revolving door was a natural extension of what I had been considering. What is a revolving door? A revolving door is simply a concept based on the perception that there is often a striking similarity between those who are elected, are regulated or hired, or are employed and those who do the regulating or hiring. It was used extensively in the 1990s to describe big corporations and, in particular, pharmaceutical companies. The public, particularly legislators, have long demanded the deletion of these "revolving doors." In 1995, the US Senate voted to prohibit federal judges and Supreme Court Justices from having to recuse themselves because of their previous financial investments in corporations or corporations themselves. I previously wrote about this at the time. It was deemed an attack on the integrity of the judiciary. In 1998, the Senate voted to prevent Supreme Court Justices from having to recuse themselves from a case due to their previous investments in a corporation. In 2000, we saw more of the same, with the US House and Senate again voting to prevent Supreme Court Justices from having to recuse themselves due to their previous financial investments in corporations or corporations themselves. The Supreme Court was also censured by Congress. The American Bar Association (ABA) also adopted a resolution against the Supreme Court's use of "politically sensitive cases." There have been calls for legislation to prevent judges from working for corporations or regulatory boards for similar reasons
